The origin of health disorders

Scientific research shows that illness has a specific meaning and purpose in terms of the survival of the species. Health disorders as well as limiting behaviors are the result of an adaptive mechanism, which is triggered in synchronicity with our emotional traumas and stresses.

Despite appearances, nothing happens at random and all living beings are programmed in terms of survival. An illness or symptom is the result of an unresolved emotional distress. When an individual is unable to consciously find a solution to an emotional conflict and when this conflict creates unmanageable stress, the subconscious brain will transpose the stress into the organ. This is the moment when the illness begins.

As soon as we experience a peak level of stress (shock or intense permanent conflict), we solicit our sympathetic nervous system (fight or flight response). During such circumstances our subconscious brain evaluates our situation as dangerous. Subsequently an adaptive program involving a change in our biology (disease) will manifest. Our organs express our emotions, in ways that permit to resolve in our body what we cannot resolve in our mind. For instance a shock related to a painful separation, the loss of a loved one, a worry for a child, or the fear of death can prompt unmanageable stresses and be at the root of specific illnesses.

Similarly, negative reactions or limiting behaviors within each of us, which appear to be triggered by people or various circumstances, are in fact associated to our subconscious imprints. We can eliminate such imprints from our subconscious and ultimately change our behavioral and biological reactions.

Our health disorders as well as our behaviors, choices and life paths, are often associated to ancestral and gestational programs, which we can liberate in order to increase our free will and power in shaping our future.
